Topic: Information Security for the Weary Traveller

You may be a true road warrior, or you may be just a casual tourist popping to a Pacific island for a spot of sunshine in the middle of winter. Either way, you are crossing legal boundaries and almost certainly carrying an electronic device (or 2, or 7) with you. Let's talk about that.

So far this year Dean has crossed international borders over 40 times. His passport has more stamps than the Taumararui Post Office. He also has a "spare" bass guitar in Spain. Nice.

Come along to this talk and hear some cyber tips for private and corporate international travel. Or maybe just come to enjoy the photos of airport lounges and bass guitars.

Presenter: Dean Carter

Dean used to collect IT and Infosec certifications... he found himself contemplating doing an F5 course and exam just so he could get an "F" to complete the alphabet after his name.

So he stopped all of that nonsense and started flying around the world and collecting bass guitars, because no amount of multiple-choice exams prepares you for real world cyber events. But bass guitars are soothing.

And air travel is fun. Especially at the front of the flying bus..

Dean's opinions are his own and in no way reflect those of any employer, past, present or future. Some of the advice provided may actually be useful, but apply your own judgement and seek advice from your organisation's legal, privacy and information security team before running off and DES encrypting an MS Access database full of Customer data and flying to North Korea with it.
